The DISC model is a four-quadrant model that measures four personality traits: Dominance, Influence, Steadiness, and Conscientiousness. Each quadrant represents a different set of strengths and weaknesses. By understanding your own DISC style and the styles of those around you, you can learn how to interact with each style in a way that is productive and beneficial.

The Four DISC Styles

The four DISC styles are:

- Dominance (D): People with a high D style are typically assertive, competitive, and results-oriented. They are natural leaders and are often successful in sales, management, and other high-pressure roles.
- Influence (I): People with a high I style are typically enthusiastic, optimistic, and persuasive. They are great at building relationships and are often successful in marketing, public relations, and other people-oriented roles.
- Steadiness (S): People with a high S style are typically patient, supportive, and cooperative. They are great at working in teams and are often successful in customer service, human resources, and other roles that require a high level of empathy.
- Conscientiousness (C): People with a high C style are typically detail-oriented, accurate, and organized. They are great at following instructions and are often successful in accounting, finance, and other roles that require a high level of precision.
