Me Toma's world is a bleak one. The air is thick with pollution, the water is contaminated, and the soil is barren. The only plants that can survive in this toxic environment are genetically modified crops, which are grown in vast, indoor farms. Me Toma and her family live in a small, cramped apartment in one of the many concrete towers that dominate the city. They are poor, and they struggle to make ends meet.

One day, Me Toma finds a tiny, green plant growing in a crack in the concrete. She is fascinated by the plant, and she starts to care for it. The plant grows quickly, and soon it is too big to keep in her apartment. Me Toma decides to plant it in a small, abandoned park near her home.

The park is a barren wasteland, but Me Toma's plant starts to grow and thrive. Other plants soon follow, and soon the park is a lush, green oasis. Me Toma's plant has brought life back to the park, and it has also given hope to the people who live nearby.

However, Me Toma's plant is a threat to the powers that be. The government has banned all plants that are not genetically modified, and they see Me Toma's plant as a symbol of rebellion. The government sends in bulldozers to destroy the park, but Me Toma and her friends stand in their way.
